New Delhi: It hasn’t been all smooth sailing for Vodafone in India even as the company entered the country in 1995. Since then, Vodafone has added a massive base to its network, which led to a dispute that still hasn’t been settled. The tax demand amounted to Rs 4 billion, a sum that Vodafone was prepared to pay, but the situation escalated and Vodafone was forced to stop operations in India in 2017. The dispute was resolved in 2019, when Vodafone paid Rs 22.39 billion to the government. The tax was assessed on the profits of Vodafone’s Indian subsidiary. The dispute involved the tax liability of Vodafone’s Indian subsidiary. The Indian government had argued that the company had not paid the tax on the profits earned in India. Vodafone disagreed and argued that the company had paid the required tax. The dispute dragged on for years, with both sides exchanging legal warfare. In the end, Vodafone paid the tax and the dispute was settled.
